Big SPIKE and Little TYKE

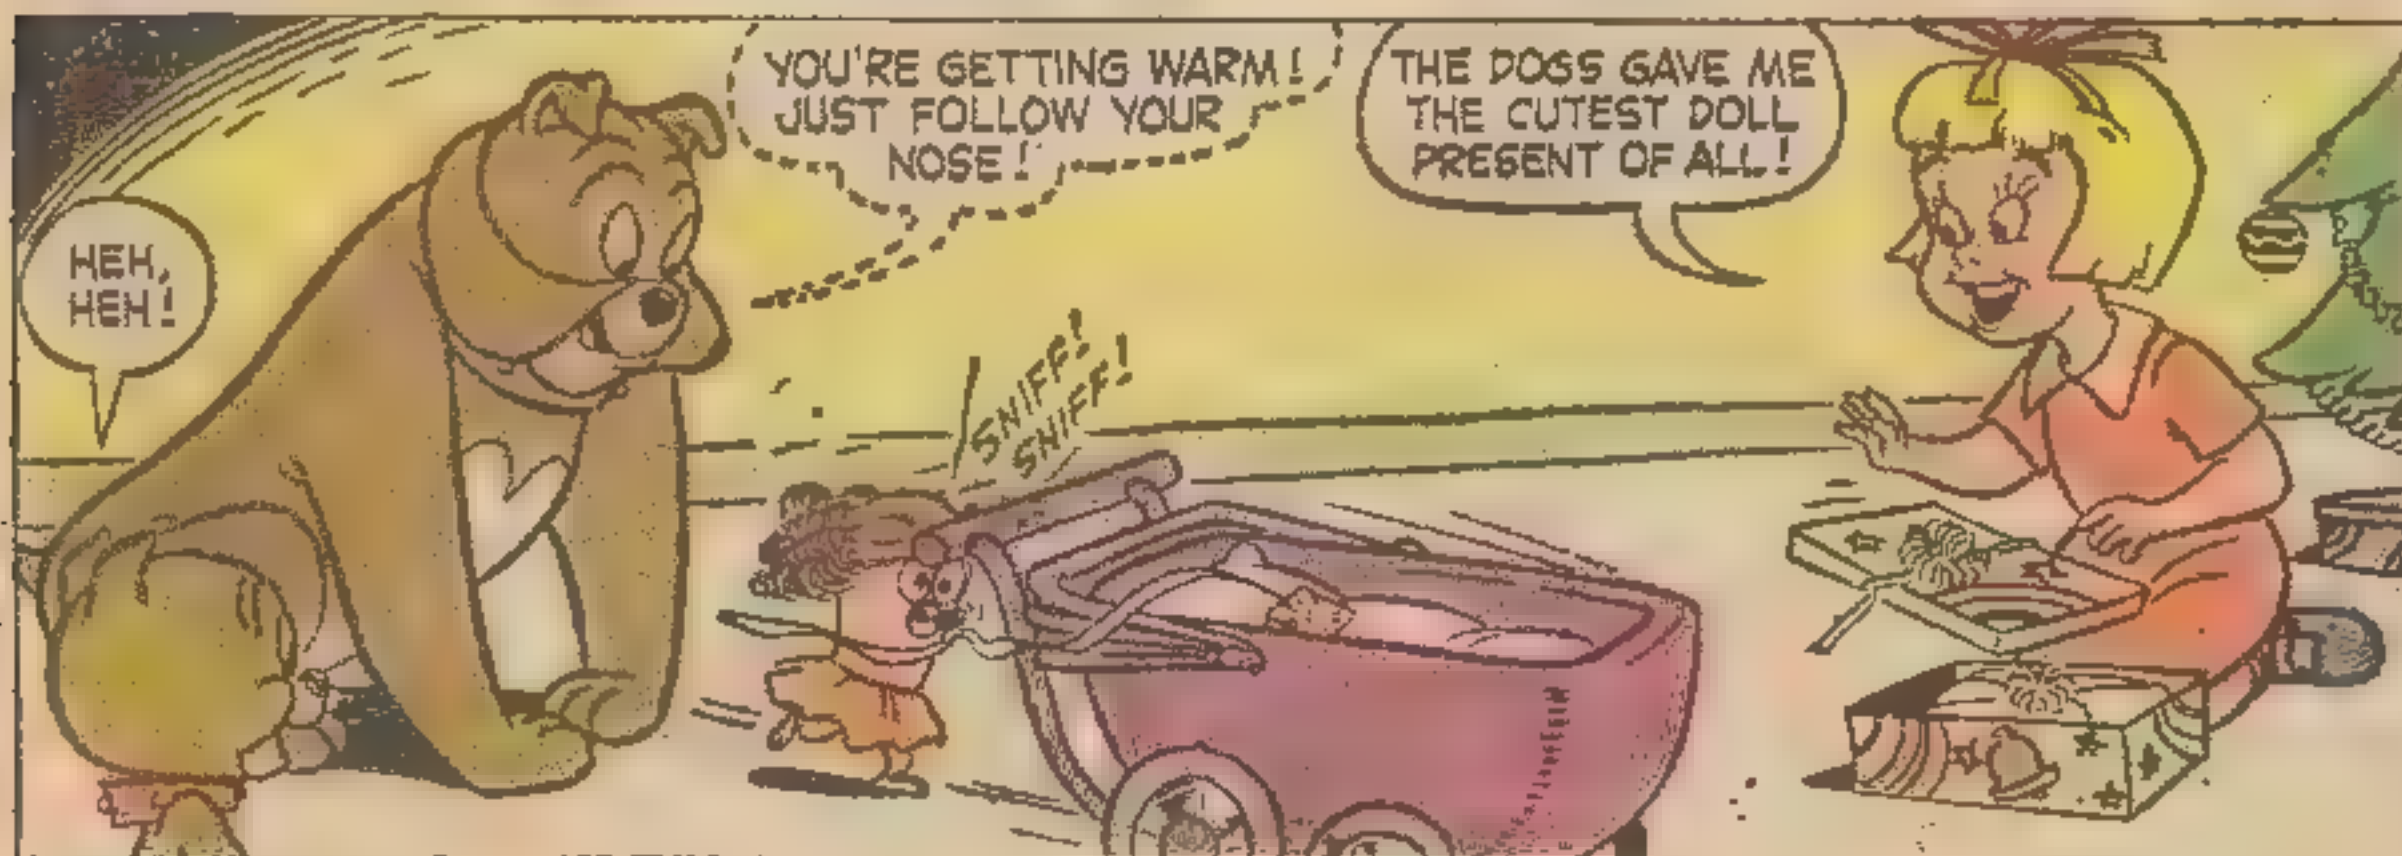

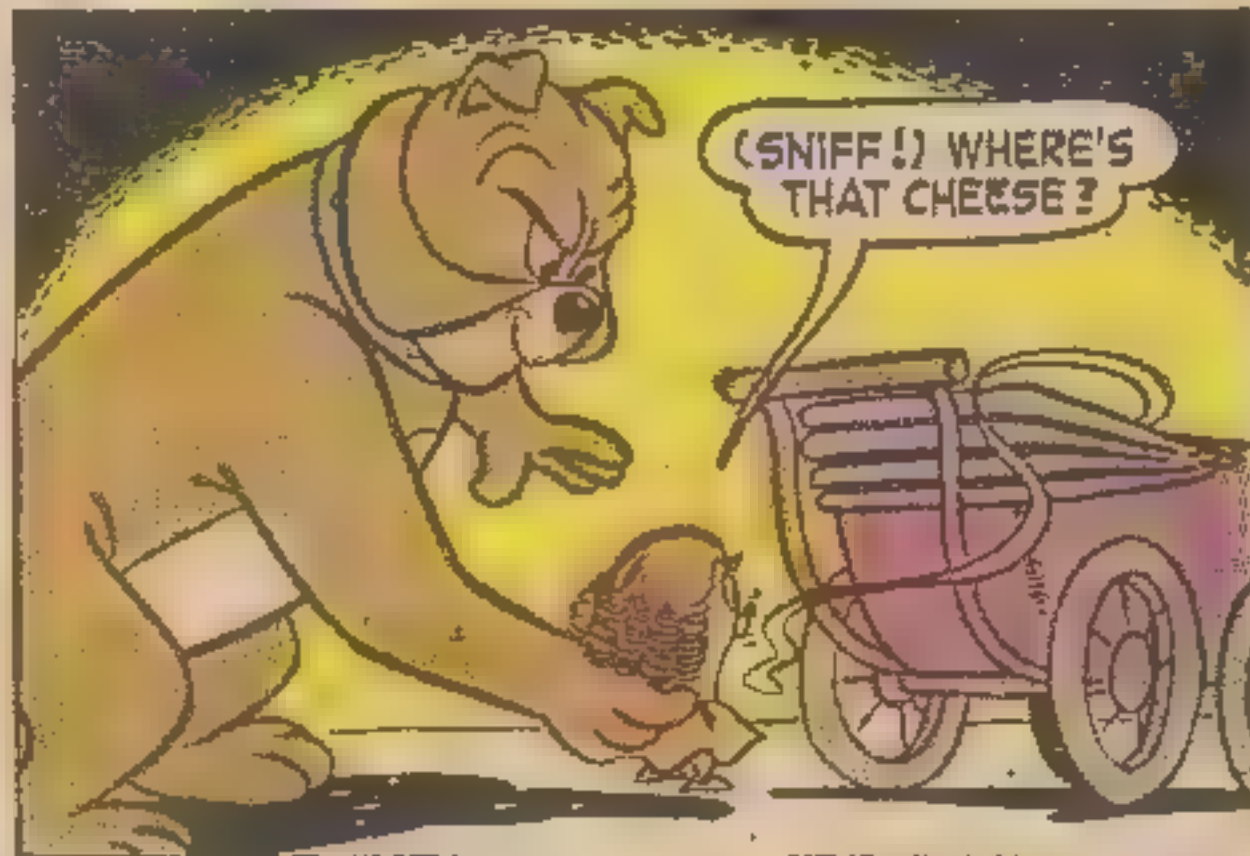

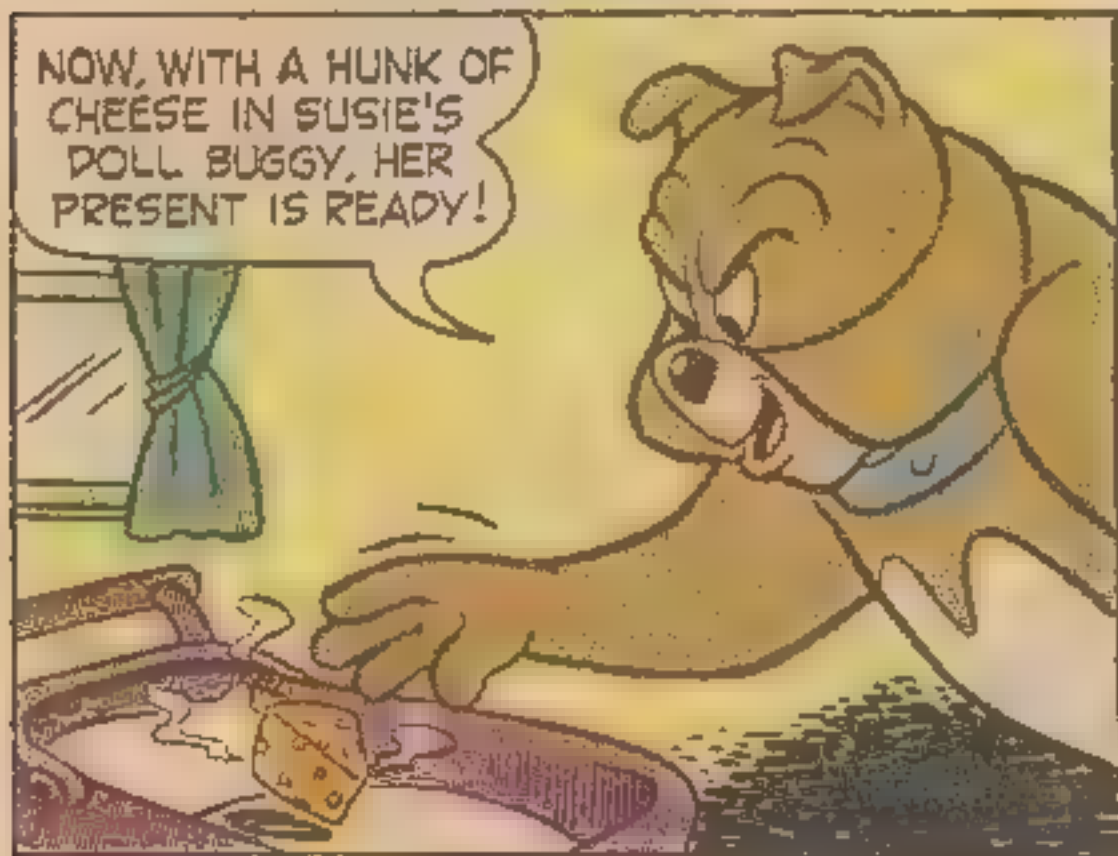

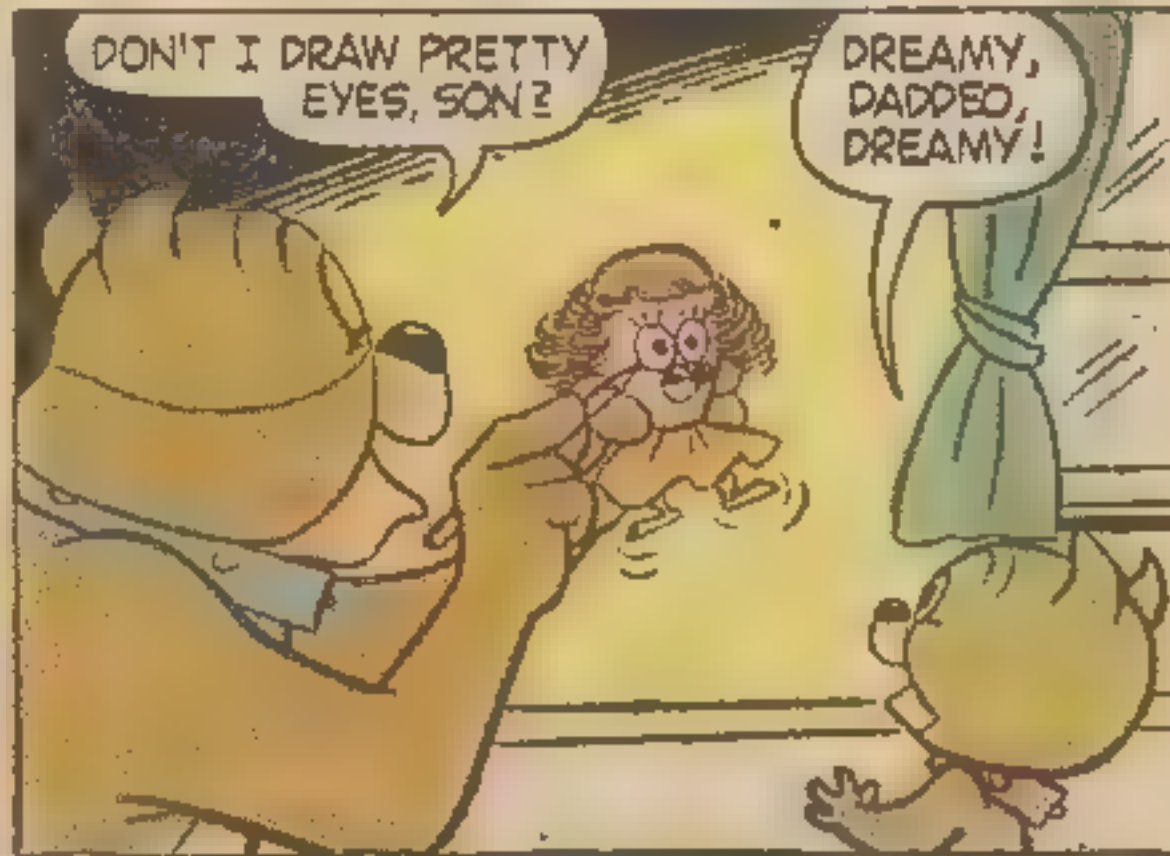

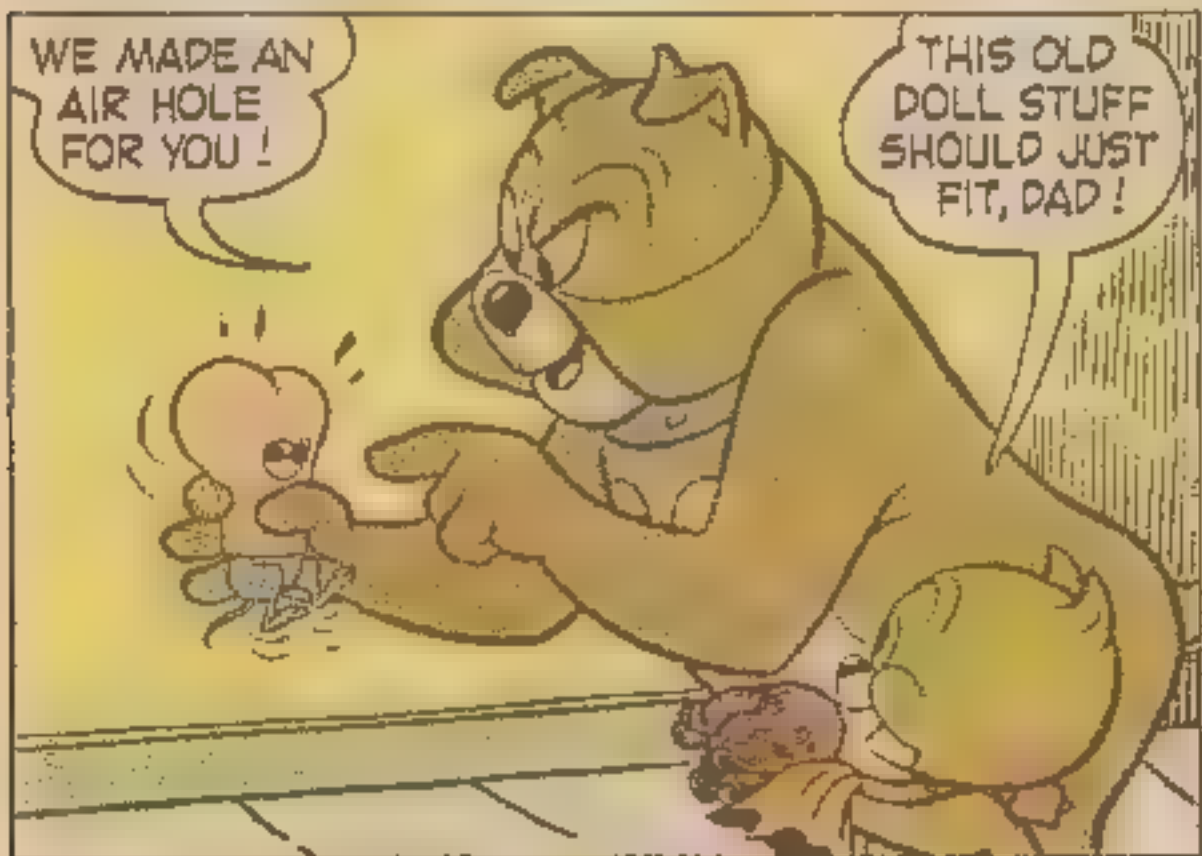

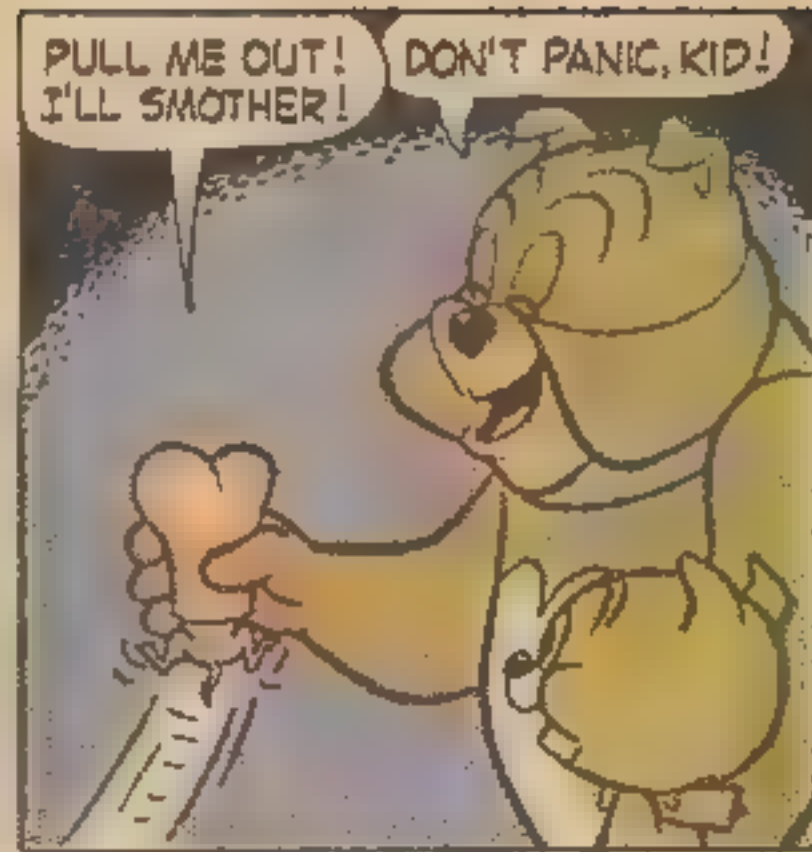

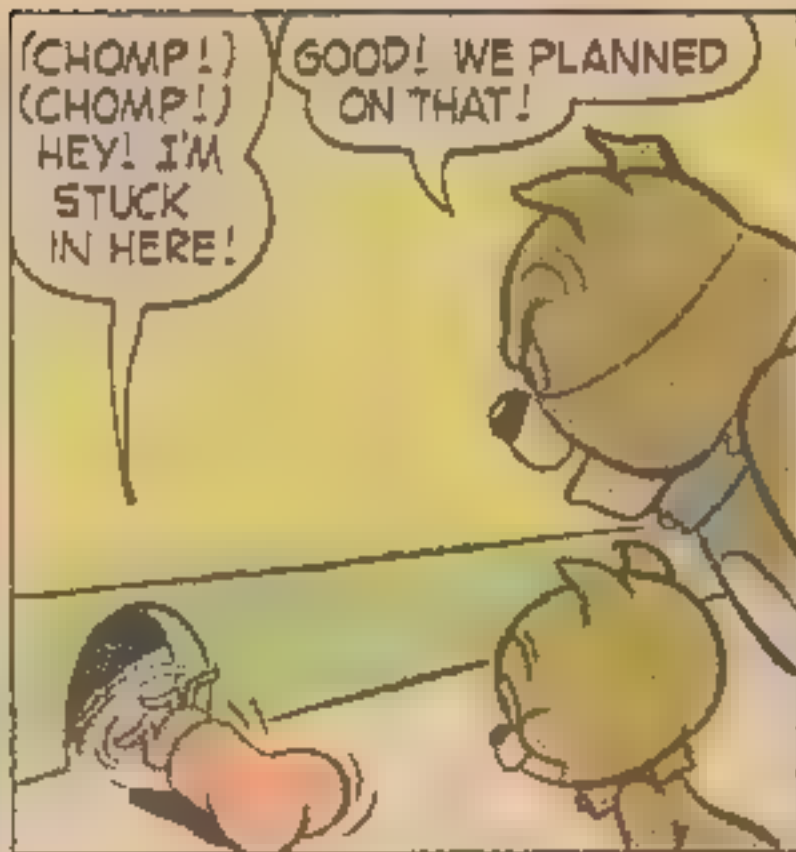

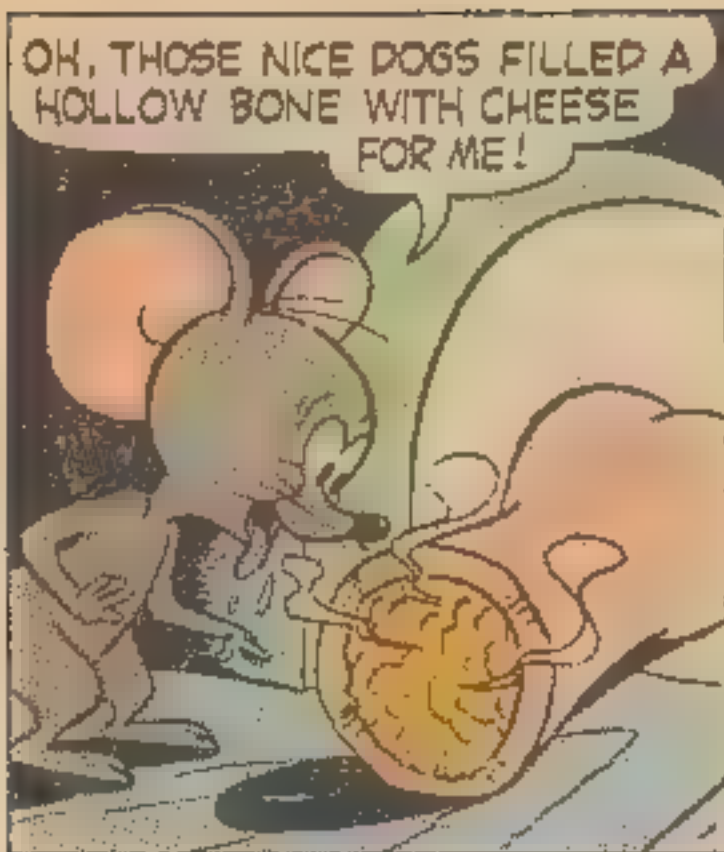

THE MOUSE DOLL

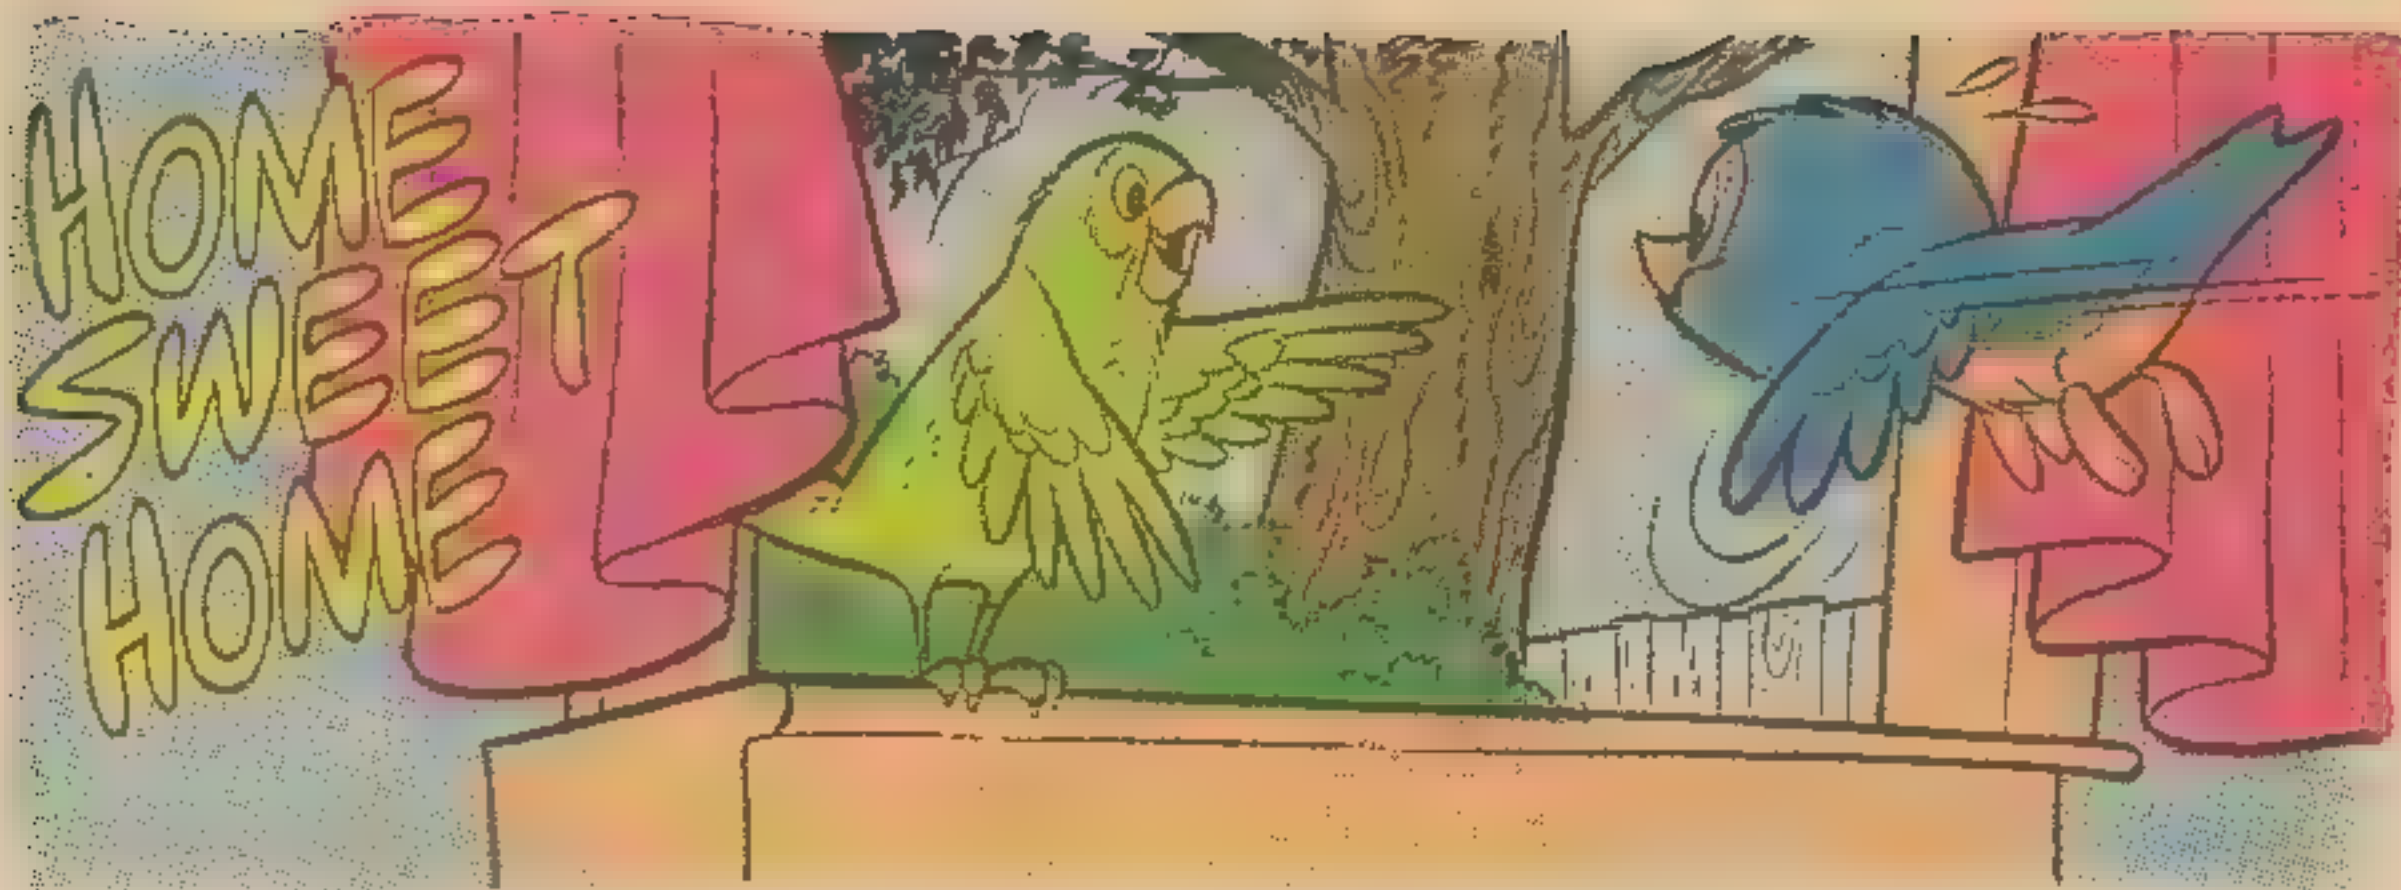

"Ooooh, it's such a beautiful day today," Bertie Bird sang happily one afternoon, "I guess there isn't an unhappy bird in the whole wide world... except maybe the ones who are locked up inside houses."

"Hey, little bluebird," a plaintive voice called just then. "Would you be so kind as to help me find my way home? I'm lost, and I'm scared and hungry, too."

Bertie wheeled about and fluttered to join a brightly-colored stranger perched high in a tree. "Sure—I'll help you if I can," he twittered. "Let's fly around until you see someplace that looks familiar."

The colorful bird took to the air after Bertie. After a moment, Bertie could not help tittering, "It sure seems funny to hear a bird saying he's hungry when there's so much food around. And by the way, what are you scared about?"

"I'm a parakeet," the strange bird sighed, "and I'm not used to being out of the house and hunting for my own food. I slipped out, when my mistress was cleaning my cage, and flew out of a window. I thought it would be fun, but it's not—it's scary! The wind has been blowing me, and the cats have been chasing me, and..."

Bertie interrupted with, "Follow me into that dense bush down there, quick!"

The two birds swooped to the bush just in time to escape the diving attack of a swiftly-moving hawk.

"Ooooh, I sure feel sorry, for all the little birds who have to live outside here where it's so dangerous!" the parakeet said.

Bertie led the way back into the sky after the hawk had flown off.

"You have to keep a sharp eye out all right," he agreed, "but, jimminy, that's the way it is."

At last, after flying around the neighborhood for awhile, the parakeet recognized one of the houses.

"There it is," he called. "That's my house," and the birds swooped down to an open window.

"This is it all right," the parakeet twittered excitedly, darting into the house. "Come on in."

Bertie followed his friend into a pleasant room where they flew about and finally came to rest on a curtain rod.

"Boy, it sure feels good to be home safe and sound!" the parakeet sighed with relief.

Just then a large dog came bounding into the room, throwing Bertie into a panic.

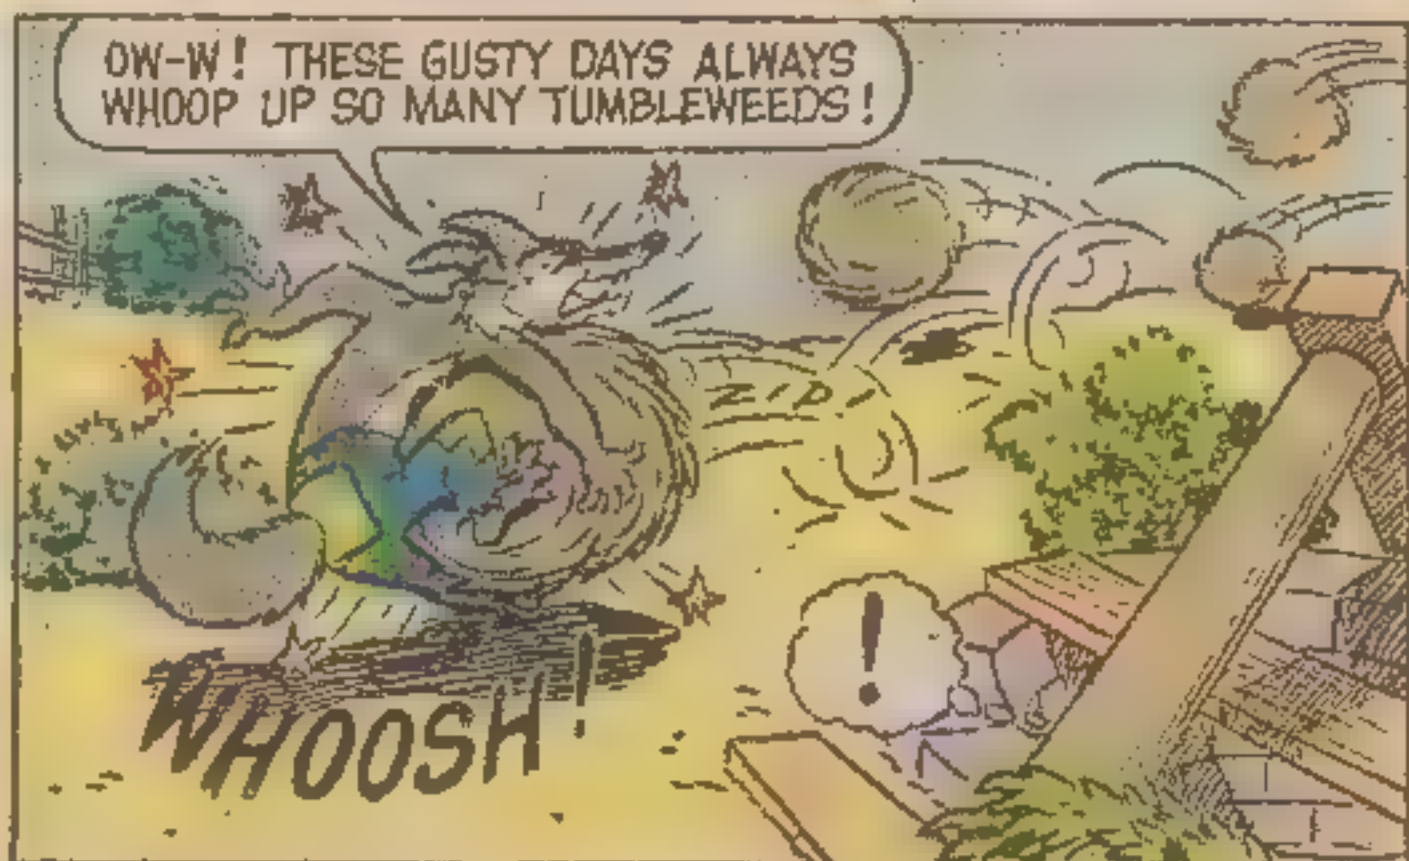

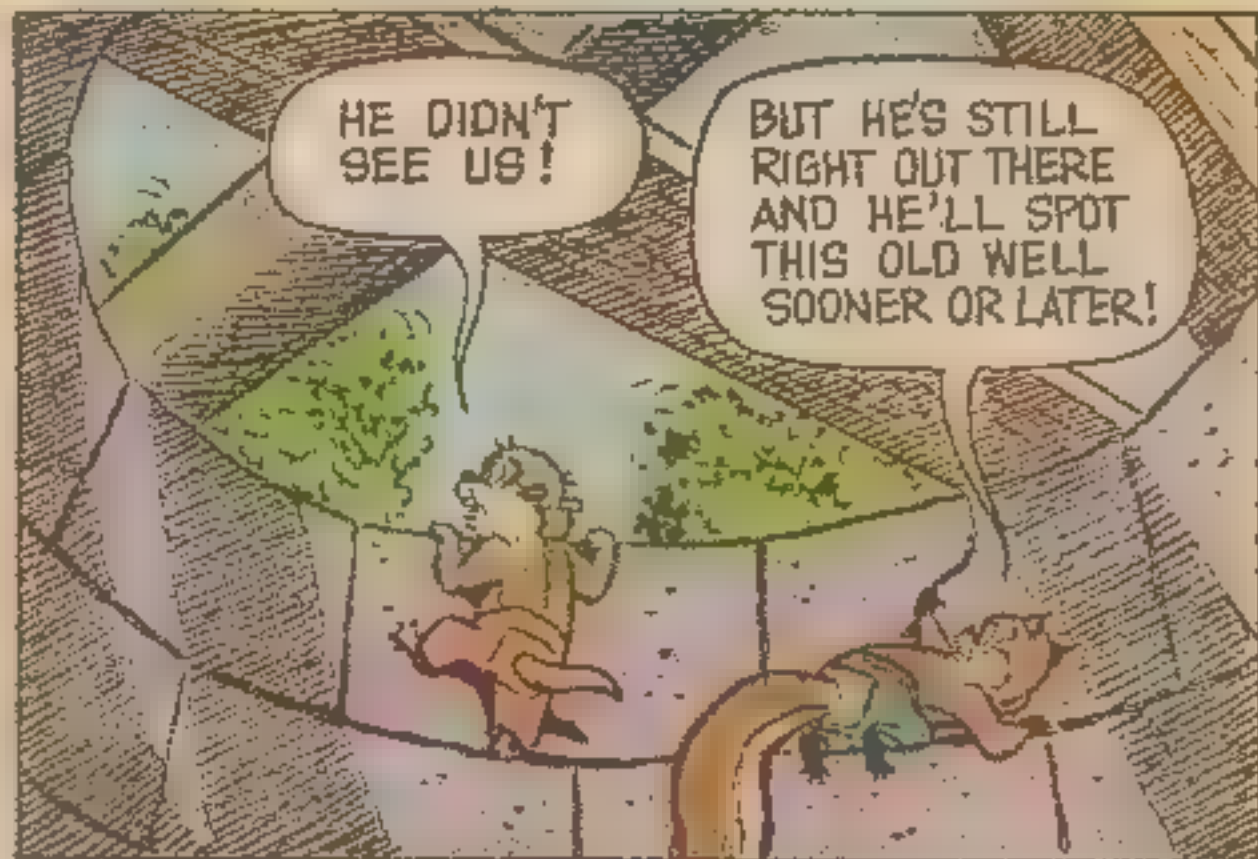

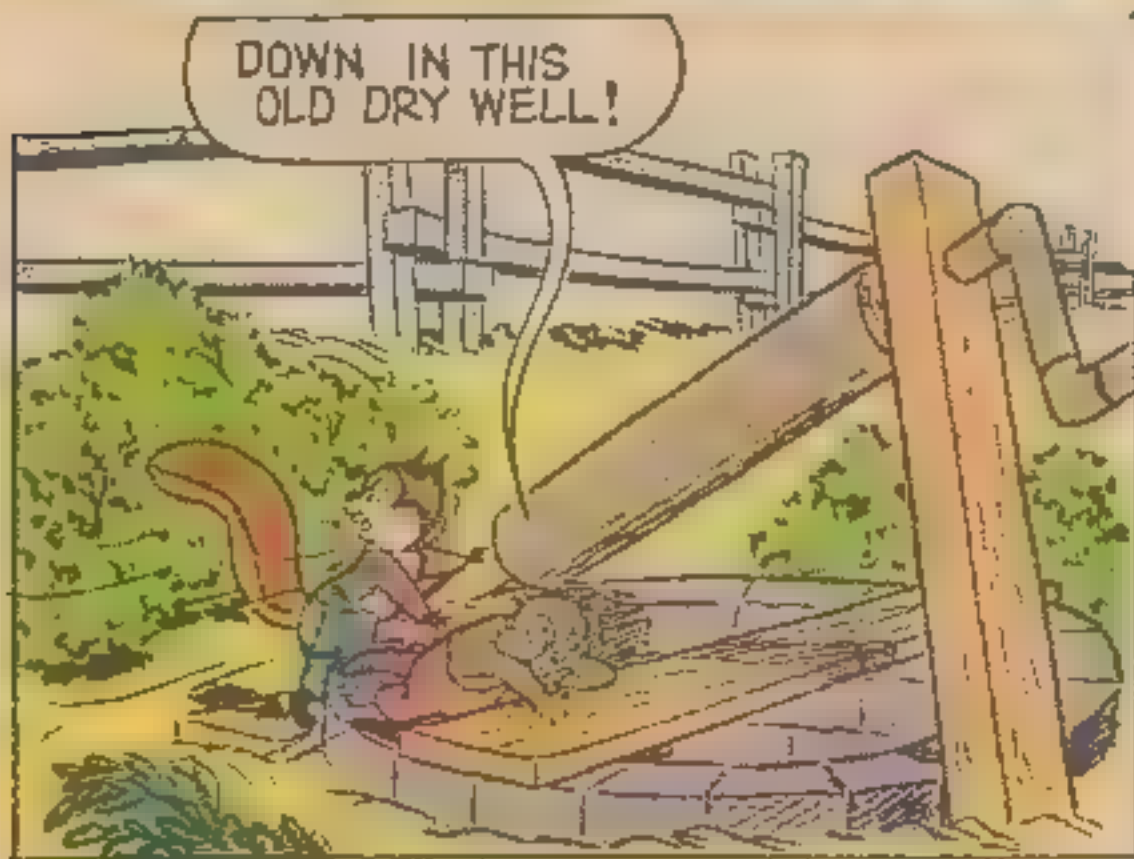

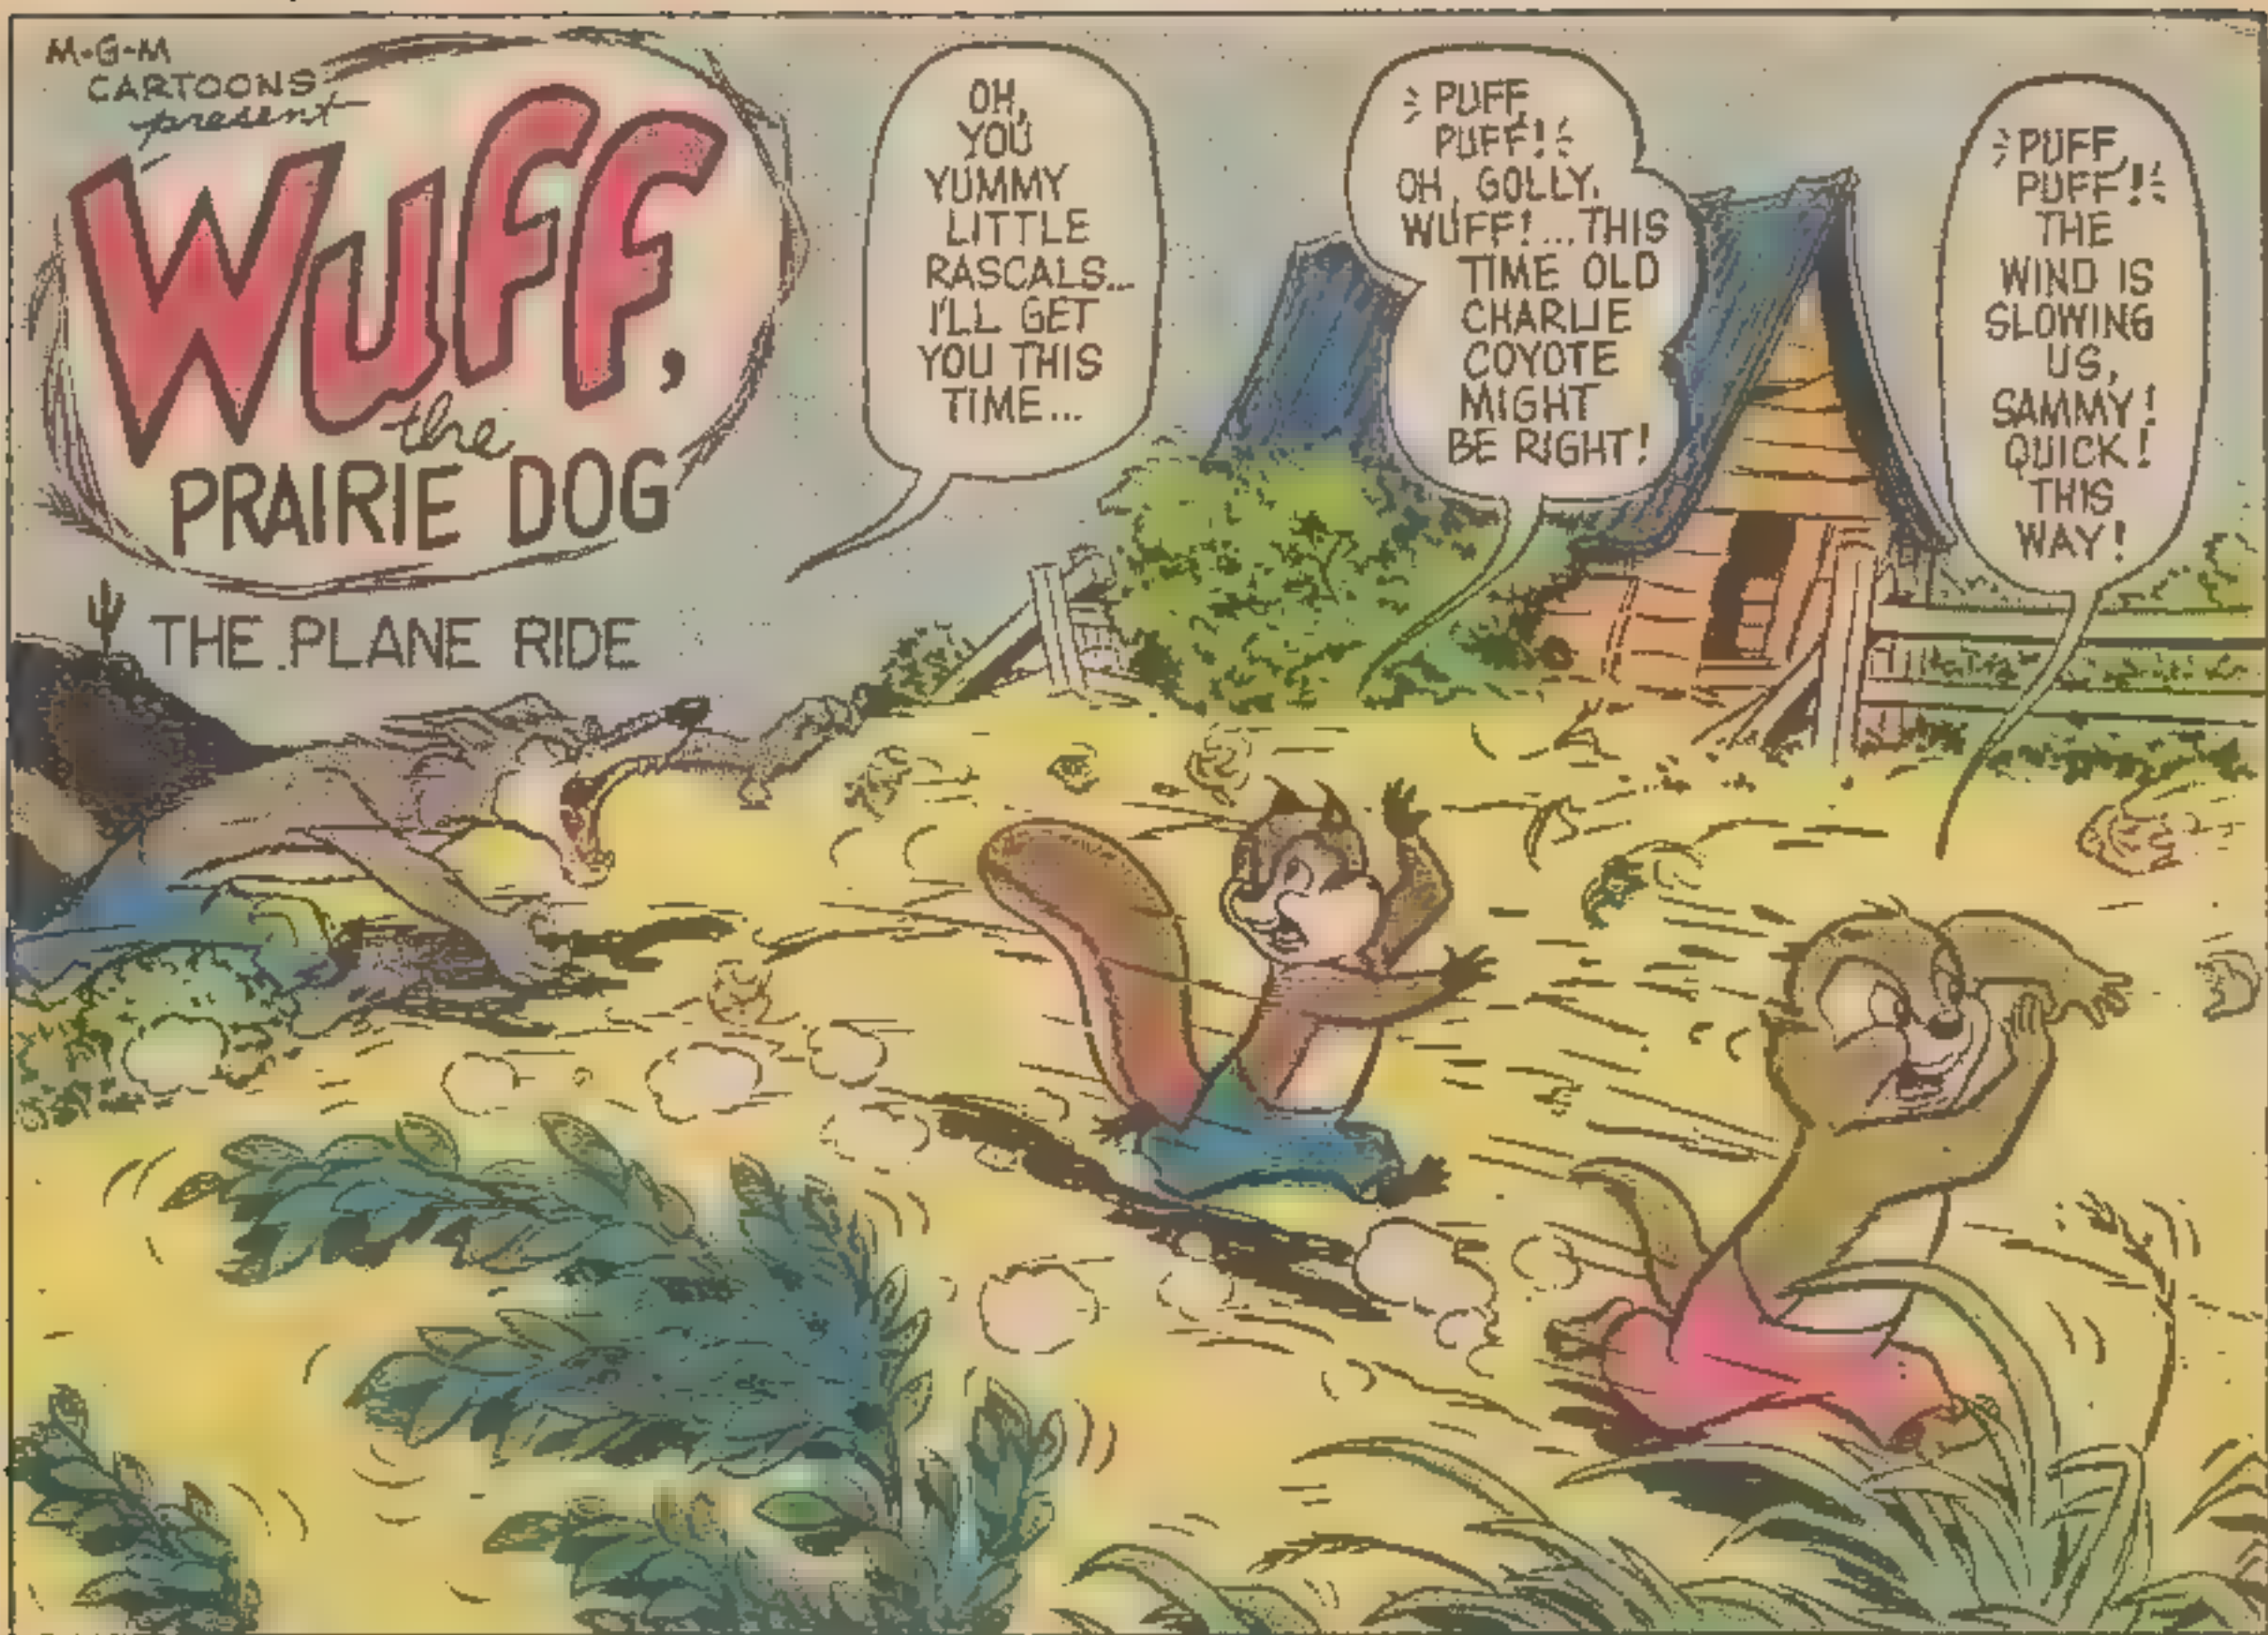

"Safe and sound, nothing!" he twittered in alarm, diving into the hallway.

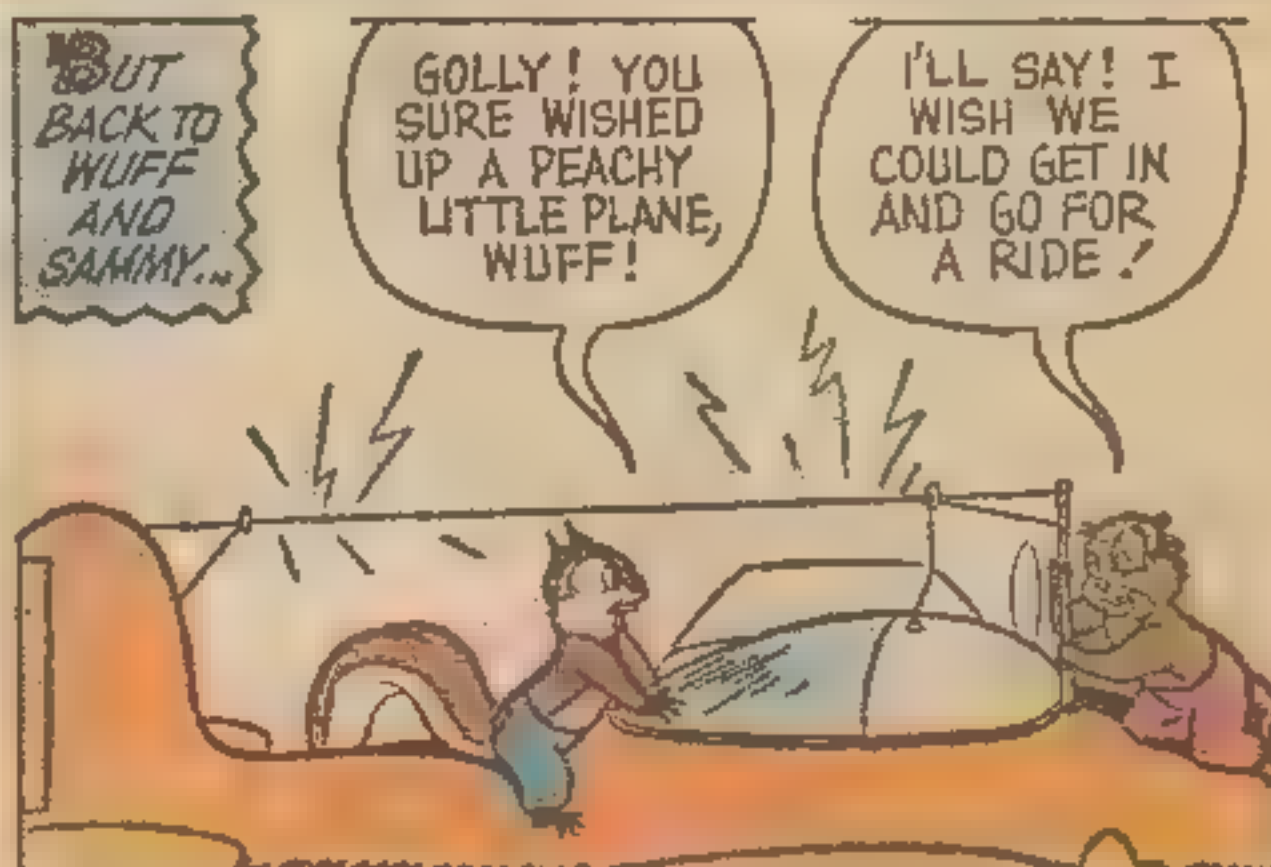

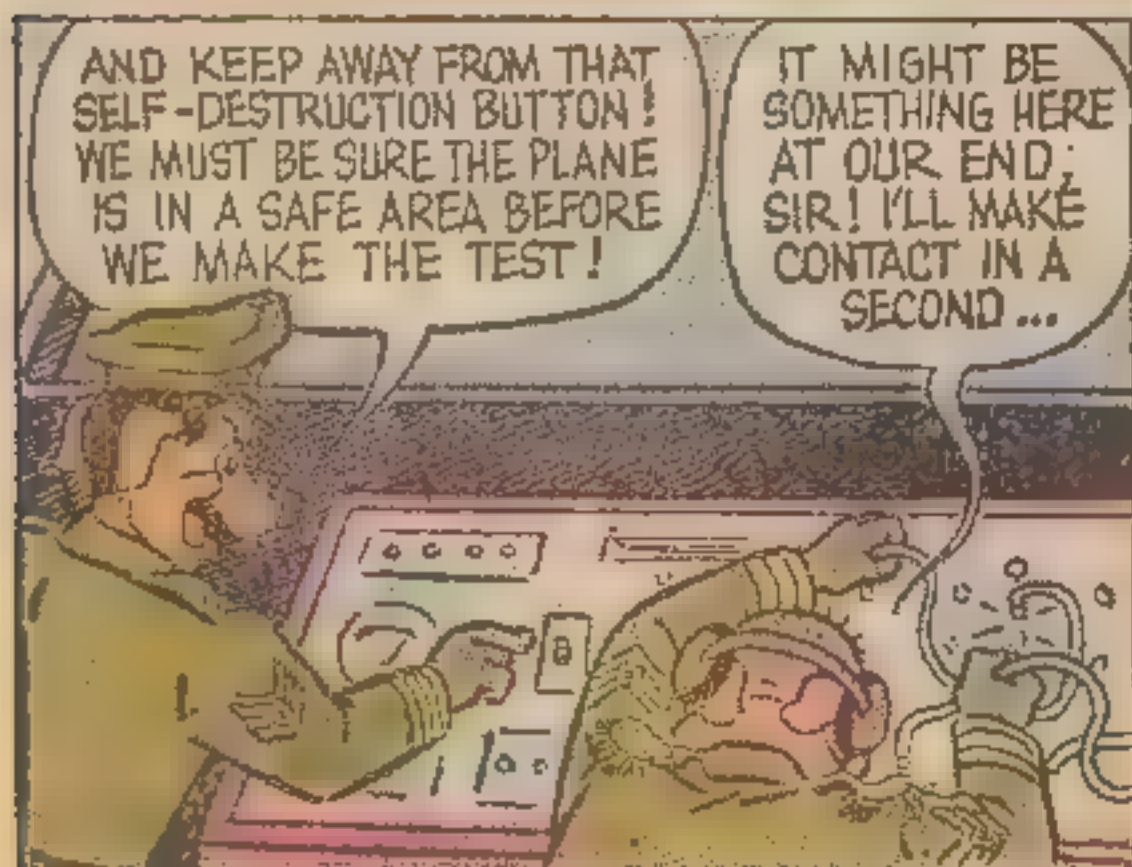

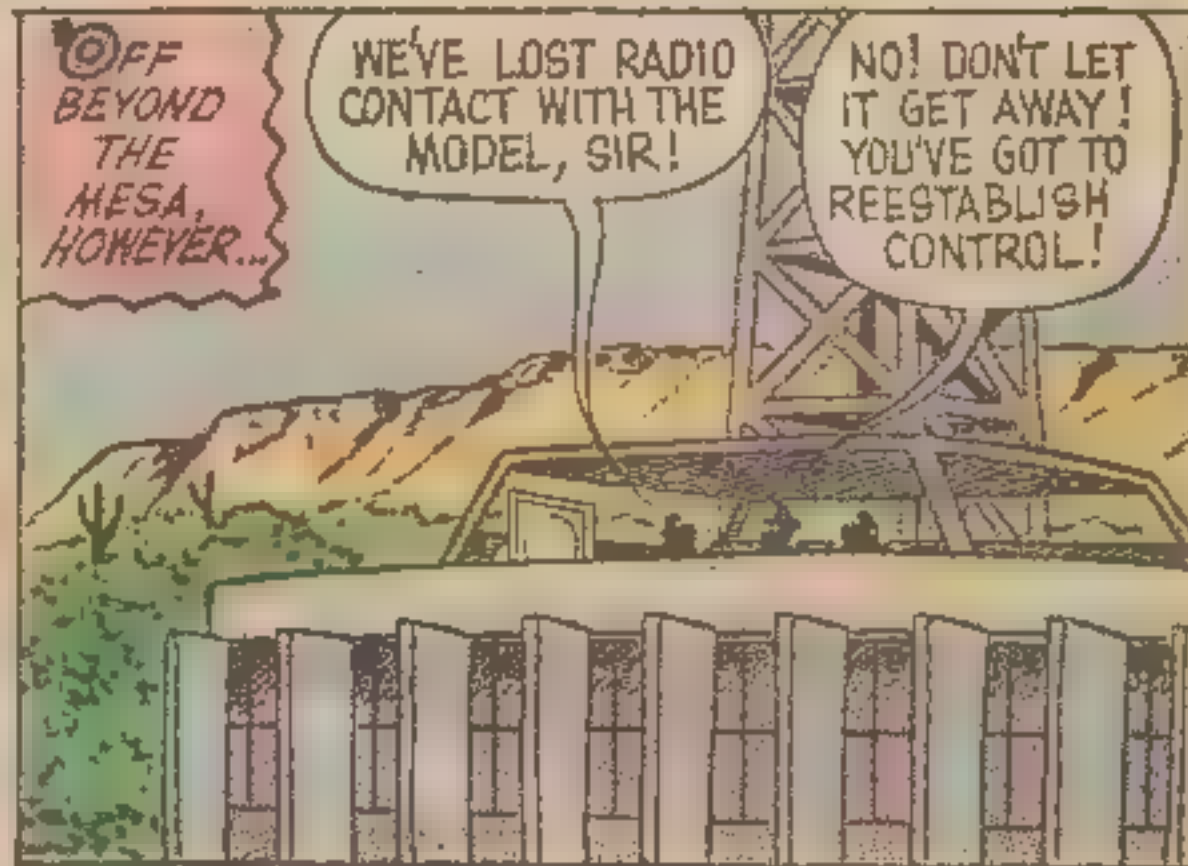

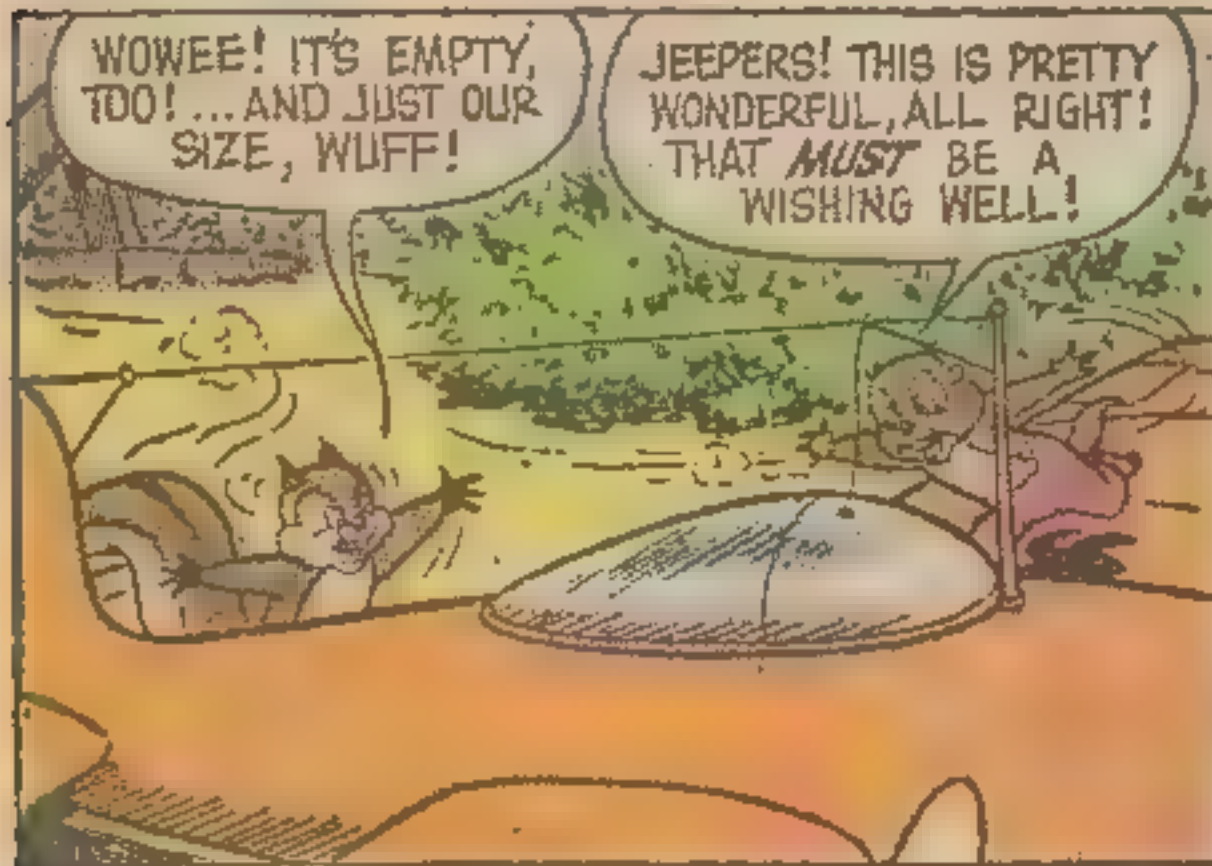

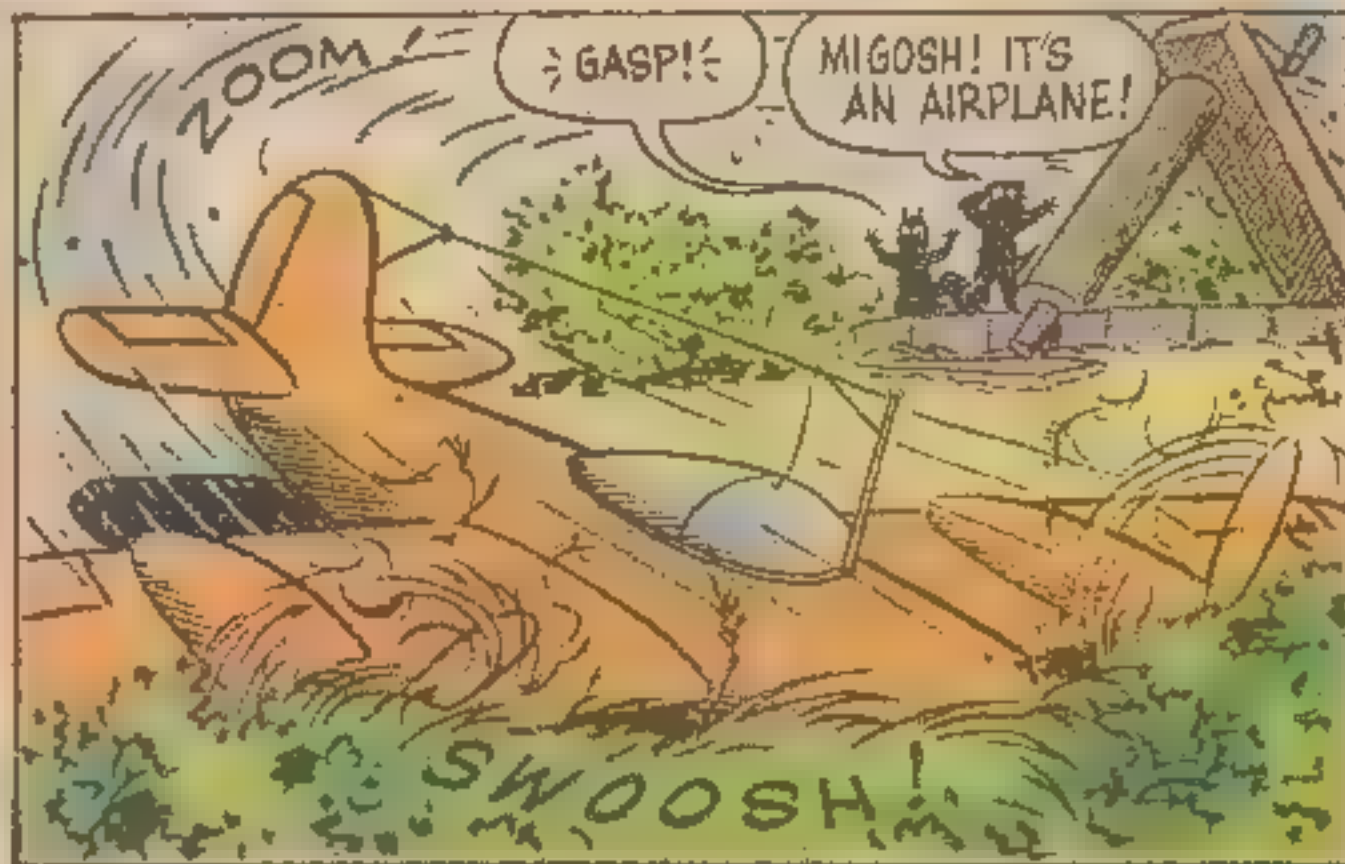

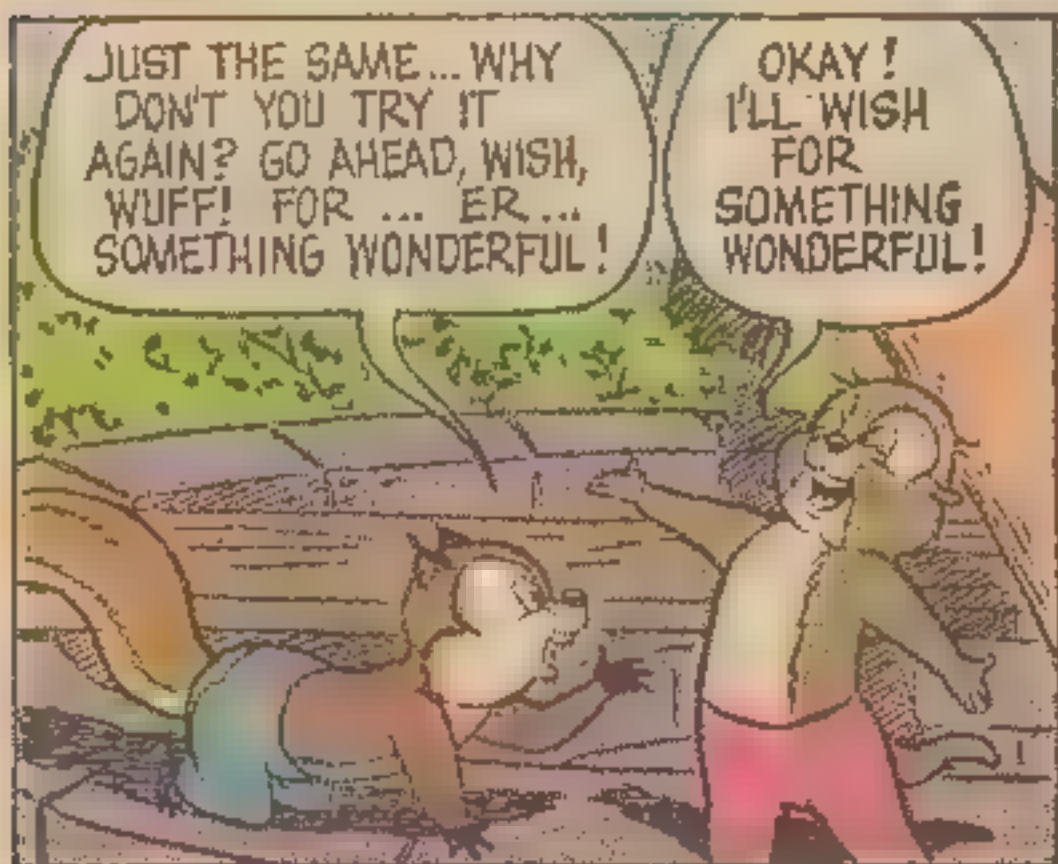

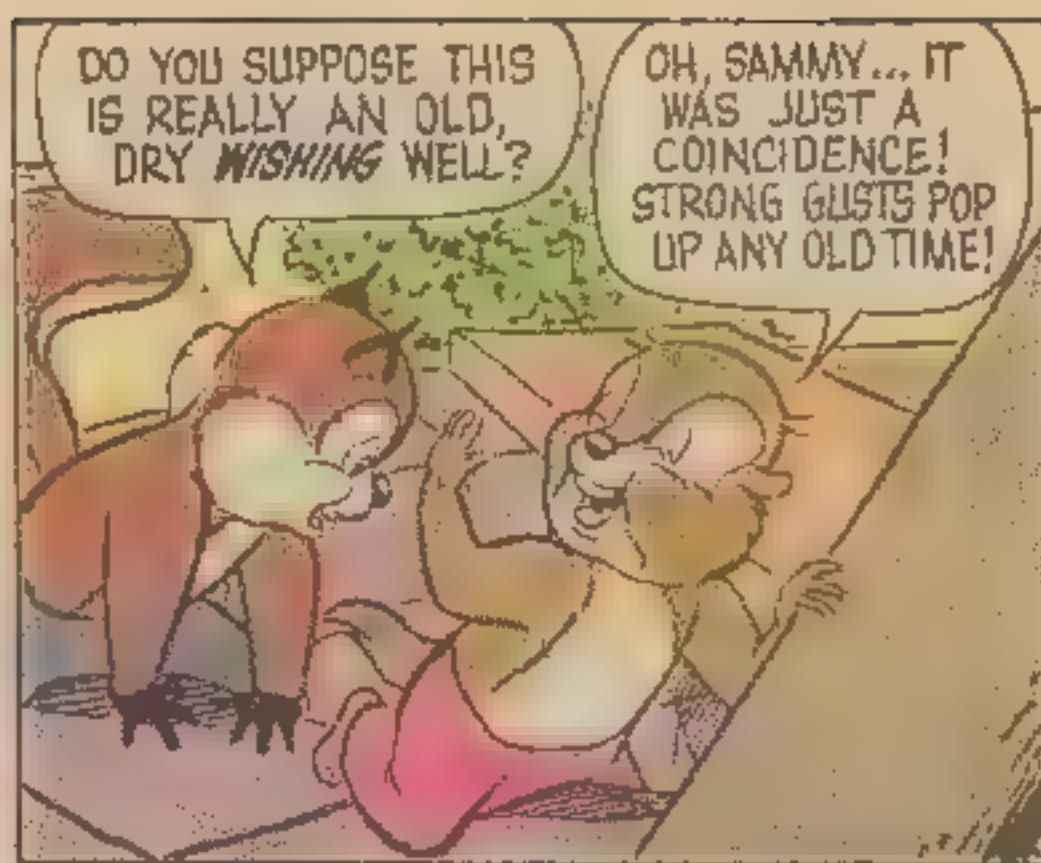

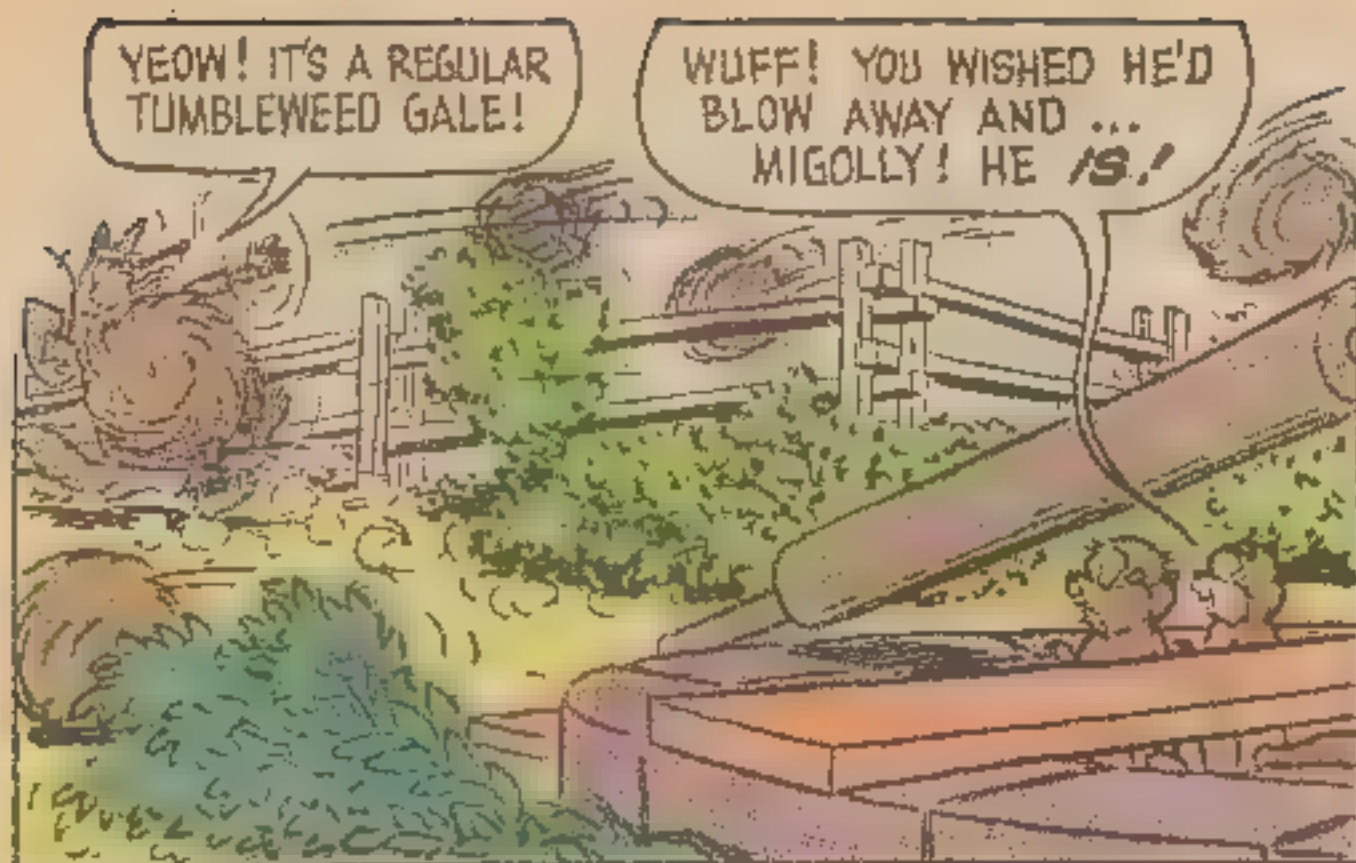

"Come back!" the parakeet cried. "That's only Spot. He won't hurt you because he's used to having birds around."

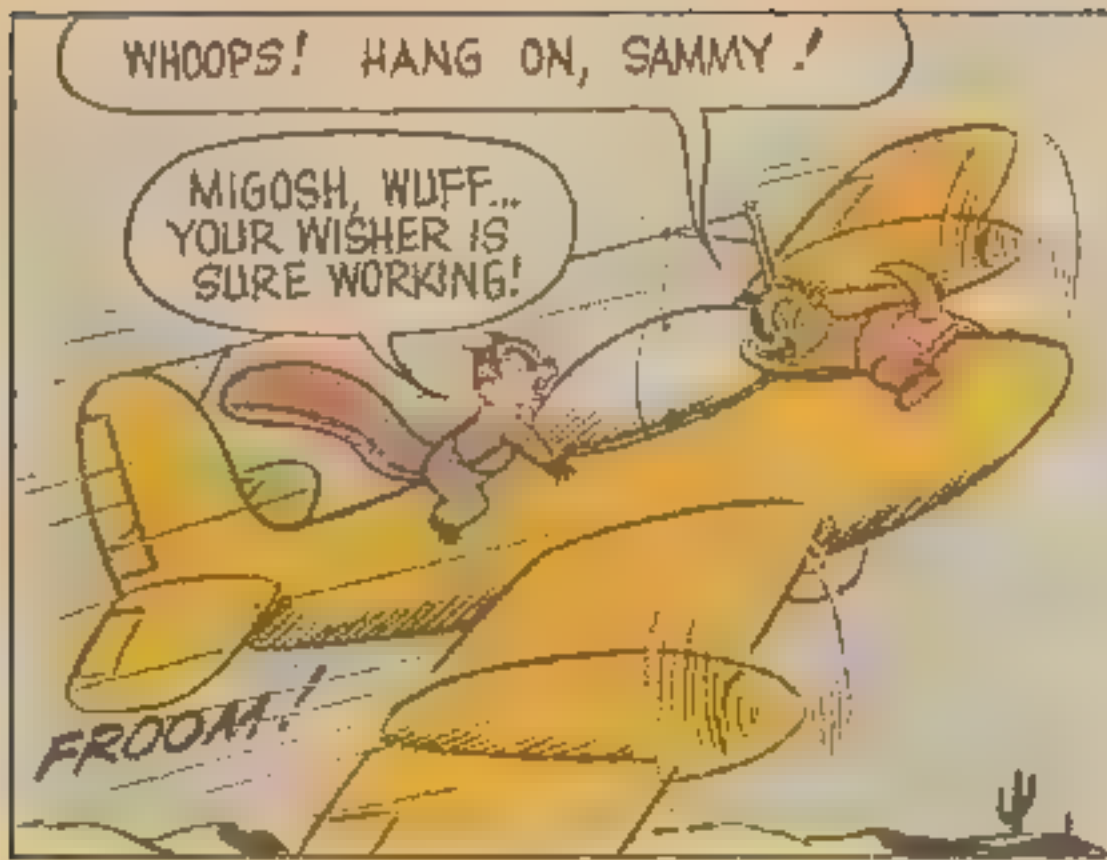

"Well, I'm not used to having him around!" Bertie panted, vainly trying to find a way out of the house as he flitted from room to room. "Ooooh, I don't like the inside of a house the least little bit. It's just too dangerous!" he shrilled fearfully. "How do I get out of here? I'm lost!"

"Follow me," the parakeet called, leading the way back to the open window.

Bertie darted through the window and out into the yard. Then in the next moment, he swooped high into a tree, as he caught sight of a stray cat stalking across the lawn toward him. "I've got to be getting back to my nest now," he called from the tree, "but I sure learned a lesson from you, little parakeet. Whether it's outside or inside, there's just no place like home!"
